Noticing one day on a march that several soldiers were not in their places, he sent an aid-de-camp to recall them. All obeyed promptly except one. The marshal, then Count de Boutteville and a lesser officer, hastened to him, stick in hand, and threatened to strike him. "If you do that you will repent it," eried the soldier. Boutteville struck him several times and forced him to return to his regiment.

Two weeks later the count offered a large sum of money to any man who would execute a perilous errand for him. A soldier who was coucess and courage.

Boutteville praised him highly and presented him with the reward which he had offered. The soldier immediately distributed the money among his comrades and said:
